

Creasey Log Homes started with Don Creasey in the 1950's. He and his family owned an 1800's log cabin on 30 acres in Monroe, Wa. Although the structure was in poor condition, the Creasey's lived in it for several years until, with the help of family and friends, Don improved the home which included the construction of a basement. Son, Terry Creasey, current owner of the company, helped his father and the two fell in love with the concept of log home building.

After completion of the renovation, Don decided to go into business building log homes for others under the name of Custom Log Homes. They offered quality, hand-crafted, chink-style log homes and built the company's reputation as Washington's premier log home builder.

Years later, three generations of Creaseys (father, son and grandson) decided to move the historic cabin to an adjoining piece of property and add additional square footage. It was an involved project in which they started with disassembling the home and reassembling it on the nearby acreage. After completing the home they also built an adjoining new office to house the administration of the growing company.

Through the years, Terry has built thousands of square-feet of new log homes and performed countless remodels, additions, restorations, and custom installations. His talent has carried him as far away as Japan, building a dealership showroom for Harley Davidson along with homes. In the new millennium, Terry has diversified into different markets including cabin kit sales and pre-cast concrete products.

Now, we have again relocated to a new property with better access and possibilities for operational growth. Larger office space has been developed as well as opportunities for showcasing product. The future looks bright here at Creasey Log Homes. Thank you for taking this journey with us.
